Hemoglobin variants are of interest to scientists and physicians because the study of their erythrocytic characteristics and possible influence on clinical practice.

Hemoglobinopathies are uncommon in Portugal. The use of electrophoretic techniques for the identification of the main variants has not given satisfactory results. Glycopeptide mapping (HPLC analysis of the chromatographic fractions obtained after cleavage of hemoglobin derivatives by trypsin) is a very useful tool for the detailed determination of the molecular structure of hemoglobin variants, providing the polymorphic characteristics and the identification of unexpected variants in the same electrophoretic position. The use of this technique permitted the identification of a new hemoglobin variant (Hb As) and differentiation of the previously detected alpha-thalassemia variants (Indian and Thai). Glycopeptide mapping is a simple and inexpensive technique which can be used in the diagnosis of hemoglobinopathies and, additionally, in the follow up of patients with haemoglobinopathies. News Workin' on the Mules Research has shown that the mule, a cross between an Arabian and a donkey, is the right size to be comfortable on all types of terrain, and for all types of work, whether hauling cargo on a desert road, or pulling a plow on a farm. Superior Crossbreeders is pleased to introduce the newest mule on the road. SuperMules are bred with superior intelligence, soundness, and hardiness. When we added the mule to our breeding program, we made sure that we selected mules with the desired sound
