and ongoing treatment effect of medications and our results indicate that therapeutic targets and their optimal time of application can be defined for each disease. It remains to be elucidated how these data can help in clinical practice. For example, we observed that the plasma levels of platelet activation markers correlated with the response of T2D subjects to both hypertension treatments. Collectively, this evidence suggests that platelet activation levels should be included in the therapeutic paradigm for hypertension in T2D. An important contribution of this work lies in the demonstration of the effect of hypertension treatment on the activated microthrombus and platelet activation. In summary, our work provides evidence that platelet activation and microthrombus formation in T2D subjects are increased by BP treatment and that these indices may be used as biomarkers for disease assessment and therapy. Sorption of radionuclides on the ground: initial results from Russia. Knowledge of the sorption behavior of radioactive substances on soils is important for the protection of the environment and for the safety of mankind. To estimate the magnitude and nature of the effects of radionuclides on the environment it is necessary to conduct research on the nature and quantitative distribution of radionuclides. The authors obtained samples from areas affected by the Chernobyl accident in Krasnodar (RAINBOW-VK-1) and Moscow (RAINBOW-M-1). The samples were analyzed using an inductively coupled plasma mass spectrometer to determine the presence and activity of radionuclides such as $(238)U$, $(232)Th$, $(3)H$, $(222)Rn$, $(134)Cs$, and $(137)Cs$. The sorption of radionuclides was determined using the batch method. To identify the sorption mechanism, the sorption isotherms were plotted and the sorption coefficients (L/kg) were obtained. The results are given as recommended (1) for radium (K(Rn) and K(CA) are given as (mg/kg)(1.5) and K(CA) is given as the ratio of radionuclide concentration in the solid and liquid phases; (2) radon (K(222)Rn, R is the RAINTEST value) are given as (mg/kg)(0.5) or K(RA) as the ratio of radon concentration in the solid and liquid phases; and (3) other radionuclides are given as raw data. The greatest deviations between the experimental and predicted values were recorded for $(222)Rn$ in the RAINBOW-VK-1 samples, which were attributed to the influence of thorium on the sorption of $(222)Rn$.
