Stephen Nowicki.Q: Questions about mono ties and measuring stability in a vertical wind tunnel I have 3 questions regarding ties and measuring stability in a vertical wind tunnel: Vertical drifts are measured using the standard up-down method.
These drifts may be due to various errors (errors in measurement, errors in direction, etc). But are there ties that are extremely insensitive to the errors in measurement? I know about the rotational and vibrational ties, but they seem to measure horizontal and vertical drift which are related to the yaw error. Why are drifts not measured using the standard horizontal up-down method, for which we need at least two identical horizontal ties? The computerized data acquisition system for measuring velocity and stably, collect velocity measurements of the wind tunnel. But how does the 'stability' of the wind tunnel is measured? A: I think the best way to address this, is to do some direct measurements. For your (1), your measuring method needs to account for all possible measurement errors (misalignment, measurement error, calibration error, tilt error, rotational velocity, air turbulence, etc.). To do that, first try to demonstrate the measurement error from the standard up/down method (with no ties installed) is low. As shown in Fig1 below (courtesy of Wikipedia): Once you are able to demonstrate that the standard method for drift measurement is error free, if there is still a measurement error, then your tie-based method should be accurate. The classical example of this is the 'null
