trauma, degenerative disorders, tumors, or the result of an infectious disease. It is characterized by loss of function and movement below the lesion level. Although SCI leads to life-long paralysis and loss of sensory and autonomic functions below the lesion level, it is the dysfunction of the respiratory and autonomic systems at the lesion level that causes the most morbidity and mortality. However, the molecular and cellular mechanisms that ultimately result in respiratory and autonomic dysfunctions following SCI remain to be fully defined. The research proposed here is aimed at demonstrating that the neuronal excitatory amino acid (EAA) transporter, GLT-1, may play a significant role in producing neurogenic respiratory and autonomic dysfunction following SCI. GLT-1 transports EAA-neurotransmitters and is thought to be critical for the function of the peripheral nervous system. Studies by the applicant's and collaborators' laboratories show that spinal cord injured rats have diminished neural and behavioral responses to GLT-1 agonist drugs as compared to controls. The proposed experiments will test the hypothesis that GLT-1 is critical for peripheral mechanisms that regulate respiratory and autonomic function in the spinal cord. This will be accomplished through 2 specific aims. The first aim is to determine if the diminished expression and function of GLT-1 on the peripheral autonomic neuromuscular junction in the spinal cord constitutes a key factor in the spinal cord syndrome that leads to autonomic paralysis and apnea following SCI. This will be accomplished using immunohistochemistry, administration of the GLT-1 inhibitor dihydrokainate, and agonist drugs on peripheral and central targets to
